Schlesinger-Henle syndrome in a renal allograft patient. We report a patient with Schlesinger-Henle syndrome (SHS) who had undergone renal transplantation and was treated with tacrolimus, after which he developed proteinuria and proteinuria nephrotic syndrome. The concentration of tacrolimus in his serum was 5.2 ng/mL and the trough level was 2.4 ng/mL. After the dose was increased, the trough level reached 14.3 ng/mL, and his proteinuria resolved. At 15 months after the dose of tacrolimus was increased, the concentration of tacrolimus in his serum was 24.0 ng/mL and the trough level was 13.3 ng/mL. The concentration of tacrolimus in his serum did not decrease when he had a proteinuria nephrotic syndrome; however, the concentration of tacrolimus in his serum had decreased when proteinuria was not present. Therefore, we suspect that this patient may have developed a mechanism that lowered his renal blood flow after renal transplantation and that the concentration of tacrolimus in his serum was too low to control proteinuria.
